In a response filed Thursday with the SEC, Charter is refuting Dish's claims concerning the merger.

According to Charter, New Charter would only serve 23 percent of subscribers receiving 25 Mbps or higher, which it says is smaller than the percentage Comcast serves today and much smaller than the 60 percent Comcast and TWC would have served had those companies been allowed to merge.

In all, New Charter would serve 21 percent of all wireline broadband customers, according to Charter, which the company says is less than Comcast and more than AT&T.

Charter also says that New Charter would be a better platform for online video distributors (OVD), pointing out that Netflix has given its blessing to the merger. Charter also says it views OTT content as complimentary to its MVPD service and that its cloud-based programming guide enables OVD content to be accessed along with cable networks.
